HEALTHY TIPS

Respiratory syncytial virus, or RSV, is a common respiratory virus that infects the nose, throat, and lungs. RSV spreads in the fall and winter along with other respiratory viruses.

The initial signs of RSV are similar to mild cold symptoms, including sneezing, runny nose, fever, cough, and decrease in appetite. Very young infants may be irritable, tired, and have breathing difficulties.

A barking or wheezing cough can be one of the first signs of a more serious illness. In these instances, the virus has spread to the lower respiratory tract, causing inflammation of the small airways entering the lungs. This can lead to pneumonia and bronchiolitis. Please see your child’s PCP or take your child to the emergency room, if your child has the above-mentioned symptoms.
